Cont. of 11. After further consulation with the Examiner's supervisor and another primary examiner, it was decided that the Hellerstein reference still applies for the following reasons.

Applicants argue that Hellerstein does not use monoisotopic and isotopomeric peaks, but instead uses the isotopomeric peak height ratio, and therefore is calculating the molar excess. In the present invention, the monoisotopic peak is used in the calculations. As such, the effect of the increase, or decrease, in to amount of the monoisotopic peak is in the opposite direction as that of the isotopomeric peaks and this effect would alter the calculations of Hellerstein.

Applicants arguments have not been found persuasive because paragraph 27 defines monoisotopic mass as "a polymer or a fragment thereof as used herein defines the molecular weight of the polymer or of a fragment thereof in the absence of any naturally occurring stable isotope of the elements making up the polymer or a fragment thereof." "Monoisotopic peak" is not defined. Hellerstein calculates relative abundance using mass spectrometry. In Hellerstein samples are taken from a pool, the relative abundance of monisotopic and isotopomeric peaks using mass spectrometry are measured, the difference between the peaks of the first and second samples are calculated, and the rate of biopolymer decay is determined. Although Applicants are arguing that the means of calculating the relative abundance are different, it is not clear from the claim language inth present invention that M zero is being used when measuring the relative abundance of moniostopic and iostopomeric peaks. Based on the claim language, Hellerstein and the present invention are both calculating relative abundance.
